SYNOPSIS

Beneath the Zafron Sky follows Abbas and Neda, a formerly comfortable couple with two children, forced to leave their privileged life in northern Tehran for Abbas's crumbling childhood villa in the city's struggling southern district. What begins as a temporary relocation soon tests their resilience, as they try to mask their sudden fall from grace with forced optimism. Amid the pressures of a shifting economy and a rapidly changing society, cracks emerge within the family. What starts as a struggle to preserve tradition and dignity gradually becomes a bittersweet exploration of identity, love, and the meaning of staying together when everything else is falling apart.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

Every summer, when I return to Tehran, I find myself on the same path, from the airport straight to the little grocery store on the corner of my neighbourhood. That shop has always been my gateway back into the city. Its owner, with his endless stories, is like an oracle of the street, carrying more dramatic news than a Spanish Telenovelas. From him, and from the neighbours who gather there, I hear the stories that shape our community.

This film is born out of those stories of lives I've witnessed, or overheard. None of the characters are imagined; they are drawn from the real faces I encounter each summer. What captivates me most is not the struggles themselves, but the way my neighbours meet them: the arguments that turn into laughter, the moments of anger that lead to forgiveness.

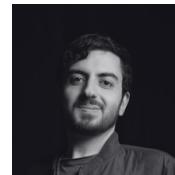

I want to tell this story because it reflects a truth I carry with me everywhere that the human experience is universally shared. The challenges of one Tehran alley are smilier to those of countless other streets around the world. What makes these stories special to me is ordinary people, faced with misfortune, continue to find strength in one another. For me, cinema is a way to honour that spirit. It is a way to say that no matter how small or overlooked a life may seem, within it lies a world of meaning and beauty. This film is my attempt to capture that to express the everyday struggle and the quiet heroism of forgiveness into a story that, while born in my neighbourhood, belongs to everyone.

SYNOPSIS

Set in the winter of 1995, Colored Sweets follows orphans Hasan and Zahra in a remote Kashmiri village as they wait for their father, missing in the war. During Eid, they hear of "Colored Sweets"—candies said to make dreams come true. Believing these can bring their father back.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

I am a filmmaker who tells stories from conflict zones. No matter the setting, one truth remains: children always suffer. This has become the central theme of my work because wars have persisted since the day I was born. Each of my films, whether set in Kashmir, Syria, Sudan, or Ukraine, serves as an anti-war statement, reminding us that the most innocent carry the deepest scars.

I grew up with the echoes of war, yet what lingers in my memory are not explosions, but the silences that followed—families waiting and children chasing fleeting joy. Colored Sweets grows from those memories. It is a film about absence: the absence of a father, of certainty, and of sweetness. Hasan and Zahra's quest for colored sweets is more than a child's whim; it is a way to fill a void with the hope that joy still exists.

My visual approach is rooted in intimacy. The camera stays low, observing the world through the children's eyes. War is never shouted; it lingers in locked doors and empty chairs. Silence and sound—the azaan, Sufi chants, and the hum of markets—are vital to preserving the memory of a place.

The sweets are not the goal, but an excuse to keep moving and resist despair through imagination. In their journey, something vital grows: resilience and the fragile beauty of kindness. Colored Sweets is a testament to the small hopes that sustain life, proving that even in the darkest winters, the human spirit seeks light.

SYNOPSIS

In the heart of Jizan, Malek, a teenage sprinter chasing a championship, is pulled back by his father, who smuggles a prohibited plant in a mortuary van. Between a father's love and the threat of stigma, Malek fights not to inherit his family's sins.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

At its core, Green Corpse is the story of a family drowning in debt and desperation, told through the eyes of Malek, a teenage runner whose talent could be his ticket out if the world would let him escape. The story exposes how systemic poverty and familial bonds can simultaneously sustain and strangle dreams.

Green Corpse isn't just about crime; it's about how poverty and obligation distort love. Malek isn't a hero, he's a boy who tries to be one, and pays the price. The film asks: How much of yourself would you destroy for family? And when does loyalty become a death sentence? What about the history, is it a loop? or a linear? or maybe a circle that Malik is trying to break! The green corpse isn't just qat - it's the wasted potential of generations. Between Chasing and Escaping, Malek runs away from reality while chasing a future that may not exist.

SYNOPSIS

In 2007, Zahra, a 45-year-old self-taught Omani woman, ends her voluntary summer classes in Al Hamra town after receiving a temporary government teaching job. There, she discovers that children from remote mountain villages struggle with basic literacy. Visiting their parents, she realizes the problem runs deeper—the mothers themselves are illiterate. Zahra quits her job and opens a small mountain classroom, funding the classes by running a small kitchen business. Just as her work begins to grow, Cyclone Gonu destroys her kitchen, cutting off her income. Devastated, Zahra nearly gives up, until village women unite to support her, turning her effort into a lasting community movement of education and resilience.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

I first saw Zahra in a television interview in 2020. Her voice was calm, but her story shook me. A mother of seven, forced to leave school at the age of 12, she taught herself how to read and write, and then turned that knowledge into a teaching mission.

Zahra didn't just teach a few people; she opened 23 classrooms across 23 mountain villages in Oman, all funded by income from her home kitchen.

I knew then that my first feature film had to be about this remarkable woman.

When I met Zahra in person, she welcomed me with stories that never seemed to end—rich with detail, emotion, and hope. A storyteller by nature, her journey is both deeply personal and powerfully universal.

In this film, I want to focus on her early journey: Zahra's struggle to open her first two classrooms, build her kitchen to fund them, and face the logistical and personal challenges along the way. This is not a documentary, but a lyrical fiction inspired by her life. I want the audience to feel her quiet strength, the early mornings, the cooking, the mountain climbs, and the joy of seeing an 80-year-old woman write her name for the first time. Visually, the film will lean toward natural light, real locations, and intimate handheld camera work. Performances will be grounded and realistic, using local dialects to reflect the authenticity of Zahra's world.

This film is a tribute to those who never had the chance to learn, and to every woman who dares to begin change from her own doorstep.

SYNOPSIS

Ten-year-old Nadia slips into NAYDALAAN, a non-linear nightmare world where time fractures and childhood fears take form. As she moves through shifting dreamscapes rooted in different eras and regions of the southern Arabian Peninsula, Nadia encounters other girls, each navigating the world through her own neurodivergent lens, often guided by music and whimsical animals. With no adults to guide them, the children learn to communicate, connect, and confront fear together, transforming the nightmare into a space of survival and shared memory. NAYDALAAN is a visually poetic, emotionally layered journey where fantasy becomes a language for history, identity, and the quiet power of growing up.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

I grew up on the outskirts of Sana'a in a small village called Al-Ishahs, which translates to "The Huts." From a young age, I navigated two identities: speaking Russian at home with my mother while embracing Yemeni traditions in the world outside. I often felt out of place, growing up in a patriarchal society where I was always secondary to my older brother. As a neurodivergent child, I took on responsibilities beyond my years, effectively parenting my mother from a young age, acting as her personal translator and bridge into a world very different from her own. This duality and responsibility profoundly shaped me, and I often turned to stories to make sense of my fragmented reality. Films and television became a lifeline, transporting me beyond my immediate surroundings and inspiring me to craft my own stories.

NAYDALAAN is born from that experience, of living between contrasting worlds, processing unspoken emotions, and finding refuge in imagination. Nadia's journey mirrors my own in many ways: the overstimulation, the need to escape into dreamscapes, and the resilience required to survive circumstances beyond her control. Through Nadia's dreamlike journey, I explore not only my own childhood but also a broader world where imagination, memory, and resilience intersect. This story is deeply personal, rooted in the struggles of my childhood, yet universal in its exploration of trauma, identity, and the power of imagination.
